An online fashion and beauty retailer is shutting down its website and closing all stores after a mysterious cyberattack targeted its customers' payment data. Target, which acquired the company last year, said the attack occurred in January. "Target recognizes that the recent cyberattack occurred because of a human error," the company wrote in a letter to customers this week. "Target intends to investigate the breach but has not yet determined who is responsible, how this occurred or when it occurred." What are the details? In a letter sent to Target users, the company said an "unauthorized person" accessed "encrypted payment card data from our U.S. stores and company-operated website during a limited period from Jan. 13, 2017 through Feb. 3, 2017." The company said customer names, mailing addresses, phone numbers, email addresses, and a limited amount of payment card information was accessed. It is not known what data was accessed because the company did not collect CVV data from customers at this time, Target said. The company said it was notified of the "unauthorized access" on Feb. 11 and is working with law enforcement to investigate the incident. "No guest information, gift card balances, or payment card information were impacted," the company said. Following the breach, Target said all Target gift cards and Target credit cards are no longer valid and will be replaced. Additionally, the company is contacting those affected and offering a year of complimentary Target credit to those who signed up to receive emails from the company. It is estimated that this will take place in late March. Target and other retailers are increasingly concerned about public and congressional scrutiny of their business practices. The company faces broad investigations into whether it improperly tracked the personal data of millions of customers. The company said it plans to continue investigating the breach for possible criminal activity. Target shares dropped by more than 4 percent in the wake of the news. this.last_activity.mDate = aDate; this.last_activity.mTitle = aTitle; 3e33713323
