A: The trick is, of course, the && operator var result = $(' .item').length; if ( result && $(' .item')[0] ) { // The first element match the text returned by the selector } I'm not sure the offset is in the right place, but you probably only need to count the visible elements, in which case you could just use $('text').length or $('text').find(':visible').length, instead of $(' .item').length. Those on top are a minority We talk a lot here about inequality in Britain. All the big political parties like to claim that we are a more equal society than before, and many voters believe it. Those on top are a minority, however, and according to data released this week by the Department for Work and Pensions, we are still becoming less equal. In the DWP's new Working Lives Indices, which track economic wellbeing in the private sector, the findings across five key measures are stark. The report showed that the proportion of employees who receive a wage increase in their first year on a job has fallen from 77.7% in 2010 to 72.9% in 2016. In 2010, 78.8% of employees were in the top half of the income distribution; in 2016, that had fallen to 73.1%. The Index also revealed that those in the middle and bottom of the income distribution have seen their share of total national income rise. The income share for all income levels rose from 57.3% of national income in 2010 to 59.8% in 2016. The shares of income for the lowest-paid fell from 36.2% in 2010 to 34.9% in 2016. But, the report adds, "the rising income share for all income groups does not mean that the distribution is becoming more equal". Only 68.9% of the workforce were in the top half of income distribution in 2016, and the proportion of households living in poverty has increased by 12.8% between 2010 and 2016. The data also found that 28.6% of people are "imprisoned" by their job and income situation - experiencing income poverty due to the insecurity of their jobs. Helen Wilkinson, director of policy at the TUC, said: "The pay squeeze and a lack of secure, well-paid jobs remains a major concern for a majority of working people
