Although transient ischemic attacks are considered the major clinical manifestation of intracranial atherosclerosis, the size of the intracranial atherosclerotic plaque is not related to the occurrence of ischemic symptoms. This study examines the association between transient cerebral ischemia and the size of an intracranial atherosclerotic plaque. Ninety-three patients with transient ischemic attacks were prospectively examined by MR angiography and MR perfusion imaging. Compared to prior to the acute event, a greater than 20% decrease in perfusion was defined as an ischemic episode. All images were reviewed to determine the site of the focal stenosis. The size of the stenosis, as defined by the location of the centre of the minimum cross-sectional area, was correlated with the presence or absence of an ischemic event. Fifty-one (55%) of patients had definite or probable intracranial athe
